Abstract: We study the long-run effects of conflict on social attitudes, with World War II and Central and Eastern Europe as our setting. Earlier work has relied on self-reported measures of victimization, which are prone to endogenous misreporting. With our own survey-based measure, we replicate consensus findings linking victimization to increased political participation and civic engagement. Those findings collapse when tested instead with an objective measure of victimization based on historical reference material. Also, in a reversal of earlier short-run findings, we show that conflict breeds optimism in the long-run. Last, we shed doubt on another consensus by failing to provide evidence that conflict hinders trust.

Abstract: Globalization has been facing a backlash. By contrast, entrepreneurship has come to be seen as a panacea for economic development and generating jobs that are perceived to be under threat from globalization. In this Perspectives paper, our central argument is that globalization and entrepreneurship must be viewed holistically, recognizing that globalization is an enabler of important entrepreneurship outcomes. We argue that networks created as a byproduct of globalization facilitate various forms of entrepreneurship. Interpersonal networks (e.g., diasporas) facilitate transnational entrepreneurship which can, in turn, reduce institutional distance between locations. Interorganizational networks (e.g., MNE-orchestrated ecosystems) facilitate technology entrepreneurship which reinforces the institutional work that gives rise to new technological domains and fields. Intergovernmental and civil society networks facilitate social entrepreneurship which helps redress institutional voids. Thus globalization can be a force for good by enabling forms of entrepreneurship that enable important institutional change. We highlight the importance of paradox thinking, which is rooted in ancient Chinese philosophy, in transcending an either/or perspective of globalization and entrepreneurship.

Abstract: In the past decades, affordability has become a more important issue in housing research. The recent subprime mortgage crisis has shed light on the imperative need to address the affordability challenge. The purpose of this paper is to analyse the housing affordability constraint from a conceptual and analytical standpoint by highlighting its role in a dynamic life cycle modelling framework. We attempt to assess quantitatively the impact of the affordability constraint on households’ optimal consumption, mortgage, portfolio choices and poverty status over their lifetime. Meanwhile, we investigate the interaction between borrower-based macroprudential policies and social policies aimed at improving poverty and fostering home ownership and credit availability. Based on our simulation results, the mortgage affordability constraint is shown to have a significant impact in the prime and subprime mortgage markets. Moreover, the sensitivity analysis confirms the findings of the baseline case and emphasises that there is a non-linear (hump-shaped) relationship between affordability degrees and housing-caused poverty, particular in the age groups above 40. This implies that, in the light of the age profile of households and the features of mortgage credit markets, the magnitudes of the borrower-based macroprudential policies need careful assessment to minimise the potential conflicts with other social policies.
